Once more they saw her, at St. Georges, Hanover Square, when the wedding took place. Rose had tried hard to be allowed to have Mavis for her bridesmaid; but Lady Prettenham pooh-poohed the idea at once, and Captain Barrington, who was not of such good family as his bride, and who, ill-natured people said, was willing to take a penniless girl for the sake of her title, looked upon Lady Prettenhams decision as unanswerable. It is questionable to mix up ranks in the schoolroom, she said; but it is unquestionable that it is folly to do it in grown-up society. And no good will be got by taking that girl out of her proper station. So Mavis and Miss Russell stood together in the front of the gallery, and looked down upon the tall girlish white-robed figure, with the fresh complexion and golden hair, standing beside the big, rather heavylooking officer with his black moustache. Rose went through her part without faltering or breaking down; but she looked very pale and rather frightened, and it was certain that if her marriage should not turn out a happy one, she was not the sort of girl who would be likely to find any great consolation in her wedding presents. Miss Russell and Mavis walked home in silence. When they got into their little sitting-room, Miss Russell said, Mavis, let us always pray that we may be able to help that poor child if ever...
